HOW THE MOROS MAKE FIRE.

The match has been said to be the greatest civilizer of the world, but it has not yet completed its work. There are still tribes of barbarous and semi-barbarous people who use nature's means for producing fire, either by friction with or without apparatus, or the contact of two substances which produce a spark, as flint and steel.

The Moros use a method distinctive from other savage races and of interest sot only for its uniqueness, but as showing the effect of environment on a nyention.

The philosophy of the device will at once be apparent. The sharp edge of the china scrapes off a bit of bamboont much, because the wood is hard and the outside has quite a glaze—but anough to be made incandescent by the friction of the stroke. The tinder PRESS SYNDICATE, Lockport, N. Y. 1915-90t other a case for the china and tinder. The whole, conected with cords, is worn at the belt.

To use the apparatus the native takes the bamboo firmly in his left hand and in his right holds the bit of china by the finger and thumb, and on the finger and thumb, and on the edge of the china is then struck sharply down and along the bamboo producing a bright and long spark, which catches in the tinder and ignites it. Very little practice is required to enable a novice to light a fire by this means. Obviously, when the apparatus was first devised, no china was available and doubtless some sharp stone took its place, Now, however, bits of broken china such as are found in cheap eating houses, and universally used.

The thoughtful reader will at once draw an analogy between this means of firemaking and the flint and steel of his own ancestors. In the Eastern tropics, however, bamboo is the commonest of woods, and so was doubtless observed many times to make a bright spark when struck where flint, in contact with metal, was seen once. In consequence after the first bright thinker had devised this way of using the spark the method held its popularity and obtains to this day, although the flint and steel is so much simplier, easier, and more potrable.

The philosophy of the device will at once be apparent. The sharp edge of the china struck sharply down and the flint and steel is so much simplier, easier, and more potrable.
